

Being in the 21st century, many things have changed. I'm not talking about development in technologies; my abstract will be about how to survive the dating jungle and texting hell.

Like I mentioned before dating in the 21st century isn't how it used to be. The roles of man and woman are not clear anymore. Nowadays you use dating apps as a platform to get to know people. The easiest way to get to know people in a short time is not in a café or bar but on the phone. So here is where I focus my abstract.

Using the phone as a first contact while you have never seen the person before, makes everything really detached from reality. There is no safety called decency while typing across your screen. You will cross many different types of people in a short time and there will be different kind of problems. But the patterns do repeat again and again.

But let's start from the beginning. You have your match and start texting each other. Day after day you are only texting. It gets boring. Maybe you start to write even less. So what do you do if your texting partner seems to want to continue with writing only? How to break the cycle of endless texting?

There are 3 different types of text, which you could use to break the cycle.

The complimentary text is the simplest method to get the person to actually call you. Simply write something along the line: "I haven't heard you sexy voice since forever." This message is flirty and because of the compliment the person has the confirmation to actually give a call.

The calling him out text is for situation when you are actually getting annoyed of all the texting. You simply interrupt him while saying: "I know something about you...". Usually a "What?" will follow and you will answer with "You looooooove texting". Feeling somehow offended, he will prove you the opposite and try to change the game. In case he is not reacting to your "I know something about you...", move to the next person and don't waste your time.

The inviting him out text is like the name itself. "I'm going to You should come along. You will love it!" Usually there will come a rejection and here is the plottwist. You will just answer with a "yaaaaaaawwn". Because of this simple word, the person will feel like a boring person and you are losing interest. That's why he will try to change it and maybe ask you out on a date to prove himself interesting.